Shipments are uncertain these days. Try to order as early as you can.

Work the soil well, grow a better garden. You will never get a "hang over" from working among your flowers.

PLEASE NOTE:—All orders accepted subject to any contingencies that might arise regarding labor, crop failure, prior orders, etc. We have not harvested as large a crop as previous seasons and many varieties will be sold short.

GROWING DAHLIAS SUCCESSFULLY

There is no magic wand to be used in growing good dahlias and no secrets that the Grower is holding back. It has often been said that dahlias will grow in any soil. This is nearly true but it is true that the better the soil the better your dahlias will be. It is necessary to spade or plow the soil as deeply as possible and any well rotted manure or compost material spread over the soil in late fall to remain during the winter months will add greatly to the soil structure when turned under in the spring.

Dahlias should have all day sun if possible, but half day sun will be good providing it is the morning sun. If in too much shade the stalks will be slim and weak and the flowers of a poor color and substance with very poor keeping quality.

Plant your dahlia roots flat six inches deep in heavy soil and eight inches in light soil placing a strong stake at each root. Three feet apart for the large exhibition varieties and 18 inches for the miniatures and Poms. If you are crowded for room a dahlia root may be placed at each side of the stake, North and South. You get better exhibition blooms by running the rows North and South.

Little or no water is needed till the plants are about 10 or 12 inches high but keep the ground worked so that it does not cake at any time. If the weather gets very warm and the grown is drying out give them a real soaking to a depth of at least 8 inches, then cultivate the second day after. When the first buds appear it is good to give them a dressing of a well balanced fertilizer with a nitrogren content not over 3%. Use about ten pounds to a 50 ft. row working it into the soil along both sides of the row.

When buds form they need plenty of water, this means a good soaking at least every ten days. To secure the best blooms pinch out the two side buds from each cluster of buds leaving the center and stronger one to develop. This will give you longer stems and much larger blooms.

Very few pests bother the dahlia. Spray well at first signs of thrip or aphis. We like the Evergreen spray for this purpose. Slugs are the most destructive of any pests. They can be successfully controlled by ringing the plants with any of the good slug baits now on the market.

Occasionally a dahlia from another locality will not respond to its best when planted in a new temperature. Save this one and plant again the following season when it very likely will be greatly improved.

For best results in keeping your flowers, never cut them when the sun is on them. Best results are obtained by cutting early in the morning or late in the evening placing them in deep cold water at once.

After a killing frost has hit your dahlias let them alone for a week or so then lift them carefully to avoid breaking the necks of slim roots. After they have been lifted a light tap on the stalk will remove most of the soil. Cut off the stalks close to the crown and set in a moderate place to dry for a day or so. There is no iron clad rule for storage of dahlia roots, but they must not be allowed to get very dry. Keep them in some cool place where it is slightly moist, covered with old papers or sawdust. Look at them after a few weeks to see how they are keeping, if too dry add a little moisture, if too wet dust them with a fine peat to which a small amount of sulphur has been added. We will be glad to help you with your Dahlia problems at any time.
